
Ryan Goodman Thomas Innes Pegram

Human rights institutions are administrative bodies set up to monitor and advise on compliance with international standards and to represent various social groups. They also work to highlight the domestic compliance effects of human rights changes. There are over 100 such institutions, about two-thirds assessed by peer review as compliant, and two-thirds assessed by peer review as compliant often representative of various social groups and political tendencies. Human rights commissions may also monitor the state's compliance with its human rights institutions. Goodman, R. (2013) Human rights, state compliance, and social change: Assessing national human rights institutions. Cambridge University Press. Goodman, R. (2013) Human rights, state compliance, and social change: Assessing national human rights institutions. Cambridge University Press.

Human rights institutions are administrative bodies set up to monitor and advise on compliance with international standards and to represent various social groups. They also work to highlight the domestic compliance effects of human rights changes. There are over 100 such institutions, about two-thirds assessed by peer review as compliant, and two-thirds assessed by peer review as compliant often representative of various social groups and political tendencies. Human rights commissions may also monitor the state's compliance with its human rights institutions. Goodman, R. (2013) Human rights, state compliance, and social change: Assessing national human rights institutions. Cambridge University Press.

Human rights institutions are administrative bodies set up to monitor and advise on compliance with international standards and to represent various social groups. They also work to highlight the domestic compliance effects of human rights changes. There are over 100 such institutions, about two-thirds assessed by peer review as compliant, and two-thirds assessed by peer review as compliant often representative of various social groups and political tendencies. Human rights commissions may also monitor the state's compliance with its human rights institutions. Goodman, R. (2013) Human rights, state compliance, and social change: Assessing national human rights institutions. Cambridge University Press.

Human rights institutions are administrative bodies set up to monitor and advise on compliance with international standards and to represent various social groups. They also work to highlight the domestic compliance effects of human rights changes. There are over 100 such institutions, about two-thirds assessed by peer review as compliant, and two-thirds assessed by peer review as compliant often representative of various social groups and political tendencies. Human rights commissions may also monitor the state's compliance with its human rights institutions. Goodman, R. (2013) Human rights, state compliance, and social change: Assessing national human rights institutions. Cambridge University Press. Goodm.